He spent some time in the laboratory of Professor Suliman, at New Haven, before commencing his labors as instructor. The college was then in its infancy, and the new professor was obliged to give instruction in all the departments of Natural History, and this with exceedingly inadequate and imperfect means of illustration, either in the way of laboratory, cabinet, or museum, but under his energetic effort there was soon a material improvement in these particulars, and before his death the departments in which he had given instruction were divided among four professors, the chemical laboratory and apparatus among the finest in United States, and the cabinet and geological museum unique in their character and extent, in this country or Europe. In 1830 he was appointed State Geologist of Massachusetts, and in 1836 Geologist of the First District of K York. In 1840 Harvard University bestowed upon him the degree of LL.D. He came very early into the temperance movement, and exerted a powerful influence both by pen anil voice in its promotion. In 1844 he was chosen President of Amherst College, and Professor of Natural Theology and Geology, and with great reluctance and hesitation accepted the position. The college was then passing through the darkest period of its history. Inadequately endowed, and depending mainly at that time upon the receipts from tuition for the payment of salaries and current expenses, it was running in dew two or three thousand dollars a year, and the income from tuition was diminishing with the diminution in the number of students.
