Excerpt: ... AN AECTIC BOAT JOURNEY. CHAPTER I. INTRODUCTORY. It is well known that the Advance, a brigantine of one hundred and forty-four tons, under command of Dr. E. K. Kane of the United States Navy, sailed from New York, May 30th 1853, on her second cruise to the arctic seas, in search of Sir John Franklin. My connection with the expedition dates from the day prior to that of sailing. Five months before, while yet a student of medicine, I had volunteered to join the party. The offer could not be accepted at that time; and it was not until the 18th of May that I received notice that there was a probability of its acceptance. It was not until the afternoon of the 29th that I obtained my appointment. In a few hours I had purchased and sent aboard my outfit. Next morning the Advance was headed for Greenland. The historian of the expedition has left nothing new for me to communicate concerning the more important events of the cruise; and I will detain the reader over this introductory chapter, only long enough to recall such facts as are needed to connect the narrative of Dr. Kane with the events which it is the purpose of this book to record. In consequence of the prevalence of head-winds and calms, the coast of Greenland was not reached until the first of July; but, the season being unusually forward, we made up for lost time by a quick passage through that gauntlet of the Baffin Bay whale fishers, the middle ice, and were at the seat of our future operations, Smith Strait, by the 7th of August. Having deposited in a cairn on Lyttleton Island, near the mouth of the strait, a record of our proceedings thus far;

and having placed on the main land, about two miles farther to the north and east, our Francis metallic life-boat, together with a provision dep6...
