

Doomed Soul: Reflections of a Man Without Faith

A man without faith shares his views as the end of life approaches. The views are reflections on religion, morality and death. Historically, almost all unbelievers have maintained a low profile when it comes to expressing views on spiritual matters. This is understandable considering that expressing those views could result in execution using the most unpleasant methods available to the culture of that time. In most civilized societies the punishment for holding an unpopular view has moderated considerably over the centuries and the author believes it is good time to express his very own. It will be interesting, it will be provocative, and it may even be entertaining.
