AUSTRIA-HUNGARY ranks third amongst the European states in area and population, but no common bond of nationality embraces its inhabitants. If the fetters were to burst which now hold the diverse provinces of the monarchy together, the fate of Austria-Hungary would be heard no longer, not even as a geographical expression, as were those of Greece and Italy during centuries of servitude. The various provinces composing the Austrian Empire belong to distinct natural regions. The Tyrol, Styria, and Carinthia and Alpine countries, like Switzerland. Hungary is a vast plain surrounded by mountains. Dacia, on the one hand, extends far into the interior of Germany, whilst Galicia slopes down towards the plains of Russia, and the Dalmatian coast region belongs to the Balkan peninsula. The hills of Austria and the Hungarian plains lie within the basin of the Danube; but considerable portions of the monarchy are drained by the Elbe, the Vistula, and the Rhine.
