

Rotting Floorboards and Debut Dreams: Tripping through Childhood before LSD

Spoken in the voice of Alicia, author Kathryn A. Rabuzzi's imaginary friend and childhood protective alter ego, this memoir details a strange childhood as the only child of old-line WASPs living out the American Dream in terrifying reverse. Starting at the top, Alicia experiences the descent of both parents. Mama, with a Biochemistry Ph.D., is conducting early radiation research at Sloan-Kettering [then Memorial Hospital] when she elopes with Howard, Alicia's never-practicing lawyer, perpetual dreamer, father. The bizarre family odyssey begins when Howard's newest dream, to be a Hudson Valley gentleman farmer, derails with no warning, following Pearl Harbor, and enlistment. Life from then on accelerates in oddity, taking Alicia and Mama first to Manhattan, then on to Plainfield, Vermont for the Bohemian Eden of Goddard College. Out of the blue, two years post-War, Daddy phones, having just bought a new farm while lurching and liquidly refreshing himself, at a bar in rural Unadilla, New York. Slowly, from age nine and a half, Alicia deals with the ever stranger unreality of her life. She copes by separating the dream-infused reality inside the house, and that of the world outside the door. A backdrop of nightly drinking and fighting is stark contrast to the nightly farm chores done all alone. Yet each summer Alicia is a repeat guest at her aunts' posh summer camp where most campers arrive in chauffeur-driven Cadillacs. Here she must perform yet another struggle to distinguish real from unreal. Who are these privileged young Southern belles in the making? Who is she, Alicia?
