Not illustrated. 1899 Excerpt: ...the case referred to, the praiseworthy pertinacity of the agricultural laborers created such an impression that the farmers will think twice before locking them out when next an advance is asked, especially as all right-feeling and right-thinking men acknowledge that the circumstances of the world are inconsistent with the maintenance of the English agricultural laborer in the condition which has hitherto been his? Or take the case of the London builders, when 10,000 of them gave up $\text{?}325,000$ without at first getting anything for their money, but after they had returned to work had their wages raised by successive steps from an average of 25s. to one of 30s., and that without being obliged to resort to a general strike, or to any strike on a large scale. All their recent strikes have been what are termed sectional, and in many instances they have not had to strike, but have got what they wanted by simply making it clear that they were prepared to strike unless they got it. Chiefly by this means it is that they have succeeded in getting 5s. a week, or 20 per cent., added to their wages. Now, 5s. a week is $\text{?}13$ a year, which, multiplied by 10,000, comes to $\text{?}130,000$, or 40 per cent. on the original outlay, which now yielding such interest, must be admitted to have been really, in spite of first appearances, a very tolerable investment. Indeed, almost the whole of the great failures on the part of the men, when looked at in the same way, show that all was not lost--nor, indeed, so much as was supposed. The same dismal uniformity, the same miserable monotony of defeat, as an ironmaster once called a long series of strikes, would indeed be gloomy if it could not be shown that, aa in the great Montroses campaign, Argyll often ...
